Statement under examination

Alcohol consumption in moderation is a matter of Christian liberty; drunkenness is sin. Brethren tradition often counsels abstinence or strict moderation.

In plain language

This question has two parts, and the original words of Scripture treat them with a clean division of labor. On drunkenness the words are explicit. Ephesians 5:18 says do not be getting drunk with wine, and the verb it forbids, 'to get drunk' (methysko), is the specific word for becoming intoxicated, contrasted with being filled with the Spirit and called 'reckless wastefulness' (asotia). Galatians 5:21 lists 'drunken bouts' (methai) among the works of the flesh. First Corinthians 6:10 says 'drunkards' (methysoi) will not inherit the kingdom. Proverbs 20:1 personifies the disordering power, 'wine' (yayin) is a mocker, 'strong drink' (shekar) a brawler. Habakkuk 2:15 pronounces woe on one who 'makes drunk' (shakker) his neighbor. The censure consistently lands on the state, named by its own word family, and on the person mastered by it. On the substance itself the words point the other way from a total ban. Psalm 104:15 names 'wine' (yayin) that gladdens the heart of man among God's good gifts. Deuteronomy 14:26 directs the tithe to be spent on 'wine and strong drink' (yayin and shekar) to rejoice before Yahweh, a positive statute-level command. First Timothy 5:23 gives an apostolic order to use a little 'wine' (oinos) for the stomach. John 2 shows Jesus providing 'wine' (oinos) at Cana and the steward calls it 'good' (kalon). The elder qualification 'not addicted to wine' (me paroinon), in 1 Timothy 3:3 and Titus 1:7, screens out addiction, not consumption, which is why deacons are likewise warned against much wine rather than any. Luke 7 records the Lord himself being called 'a drinker of wine' (oinopotes) in contrast to the abstaining John the Baptist, an accusation that would be incoherent if he abstained too. Where this leaves room for divergence is Romans 14:21, which calls it good to abstain from wine when it would make a brother stumble. That qualifier presupposes the liberty, since one cannot yield what is already forbidden, but it also commends voluntary abstention as a loving course in many concrete settings, which is the strongest piece of the abstentionist case. The lexical pattern, substance permitted, state forbidden, exercise shaped by love for the weaker brother, supports the proposition with confidence.

Verdict rationale

Variant-robust: True · Pan-canonical: True

The proposition pairs two claims that the canon's vocabulary treats with a clean division of labor. A dedicated drunkenness word cluster, namely 'to get drunk' (methysko), 'drunkenness' (methe), 'drunkard' (methysos), 'addicted to wine' (paroinos), 'drinker of wine' (oinopotes) on the Greek side, and 'to be drunk' (shakar), 'drunkard' (shikkor), the verb-described state of intoxication on the Hebrew side, carries the prohibition (Ephesians 5:18, 1 Corinthians 6:10, Galatians 5:21, Proverbs 23:29-35, Habakkuk 2:15). The substance words 'wine' (oinos in Greek) and 'wine' (yayin in Hebrew) are repeatedly the object of positive divine speech, given by God to gladden the heart of man (Psalm 104:15), purchased with the tithe to rejoice before Yahweh (Deuteronomy 14:26), commanded medicinally by an apostle (1 Timothy 5:23), supplied by Jesus at Cana and rated 'good' (kalon) (John 2:10), and presupposed by the elder qualification 'not addicted to wine' (me paroinon), which only makes sense if non-addicted use is normal (1 Timothy 3:3, Titus 1:7, also 1 Timothy 3:8 'not given to much wine' (me oino pollo) for deacons). Romans 14:21 supplies the conscience qualifier, namely that abstention is a voluntary yielding of a permitted thing for a stumbling brother, which itself confirms the underlying liberty. Pan-canonical spread (spread across the whole Bible), dense recurrence, and grammar that separates state from substance jointly support the proposition with high confidence.

Scripture

Eph.5.18 · for · genre: epistle

Key terms. G3182 μεθύσκω, G3631 οἶνος, G0810 ἀσωτία

Reasoning. The clause 'do not get drunk with wine' (me methyskesthe oino) is a present passive imperative (an ongoing command in passive form) with the negation 'not' (me), meaning do not be getting drunk with wine. The verb is 'to get drunk' (methysko), which names the state of intoxication, and the relative clause 'in which is dissipation' (en ho estin asotia) identifies that state as 'reckless wastefulness' (asotia). The verse forbids the condition, not the substance, since the same noun 'wine' (oinos) is positively commanded a few chapters of text later in 1 Timothy 5:23. The contrast structure, but rather be filled with the Spirit, sets two competing controlling agencies and confirms that the prohibition targets being mastered by wine.

1Tim.5.23 · for · genre: epistle

Key terms. G3631 οἶνος, G5202 ὑδροποτέω

Reasoning. The imperative 'use' (chro) is a present middle (an ongoing command directed at the subject's own action) of 'to use' (chraomai), with 'a little wine' (oino oligo) as instrumental dative (a noun in the 'by means of X' grammatical form), meaning use a little wine. It is set against 'no longer drink only water' (meketi hydropotei), and the stated cause is the stomach and frequent ailments. A positive apostolic directive to consume 'wine' (oinos), even bounded and medicinal, presupposes that 'wine' (oinos) itself is licit, which is the decisive lexical datum against any blanket prohibition.

1Tim.3.3 · for · genre: epistle

Key terms. G3943 πάροινος

Reasoning. The elder qualification 'not addicted to wine' (me paroinon) uses the word 'addicted to wine' (paroinos), literally 'one who is beside wine', that is one habituated to it. The construction prohibits the habit of excess, not the substance. A flat ban on all consumption would not need this specific term, since a simpler clause excluding any use would suffice. The same word reappears in Titus 1:7, confirming that elders are screened for non-addiction to 'wine' (oinos), not for total abstinence.

John.2.9 · for · genre: gospel

Key terms. G3631 οἶνος, G5204 ὕδωρ

Reasoning. The narrator states that 'the water had become wine' (to hydor oinon gegenemenon), a perfect passive participle (a completed action whose result still stands, in passive form) of 'to become' (ginomai). The lexeme 'wine' (oinos) is the standard Greek word for fermented grape wine in the literature of the period and nothing in the morphology marks this product as unfermented. Jesus supplies it in a large quantity at a wedding feast without any narrative censure, which forecloses any reading that treats consumption as such illicit.

John.2.10 · for · genre: gospel

Key terms. G3631 οἶνος, G3184 μεθύω, G2570 καλός

Reasoning. The steward calls Jesus's wine 'the good wine' (ton kalon oinon), and contrasts it with the inferior served when guests 'have drunk freely' (methysthosin), the verb being a subjunctive (a 'might/may' mood form) of 'to be drunk' (methyo). The same root the New Testament uses for the censured state of drunkenness here describes the customary later stage of feasting and is, in the narrator's mouth, a neutral observation about banquet practice. The product Jesus supplies is rated 'good' (kalon), an evaluative positive, a direct lexical commendation of the substance.

Ps.104.15 · for · genre: wisdom

Key terms. H3196 יַיִן, H8055 שָׂמַח.

Reasoning. The clause 'wine gladdens the heart of man' (yayin yesammach levav enosh) sets 'wine' (yayin) within God's enumerated provision alongside bread and oil. The piel (the Hebrew intensive form) of 'to rejoice' (samach) attributes positive cheering to the substance, and the framing of the psalm is divine benefaction. As a wisdom-poetry datum embedded in a creation hymn, this stands explicitly against any absolute prohibition while saying nothing in favor of excess.

Deut.14.26 · for · genre: law

Key terms. H3196 יַיִן, H7941 שֶׂכָר, H8055 שָׂמַח.

Reasoning. Yahweh's tithe instruction permits exchanging the tithe for whatever your soul desires, 'in wine and in strong drink' (ba-yayin u-va-shekar), to eat there before Yahweh and 'rejoice' (ve-samachta). The two strongest words for fermented drink, 'wine' (yayin) and 'strong drink' (shekar), stand together as a positive direction for covenant celebration with the divine name as setting. The piel (the Hebrew intensive form) of 'to rejoice' (samach) is the same verb used in Psalm 104:15. A statute-level positive command involving 'strong drink' (shekar) by name is the most direct lexical refutation of total prohibition.

Luke.7.33 · for · genre: gospel

Key terms. G3631 οἶνος, G4095 πίνω

Reasoning. Jesus contrasts himself with John the Baptist, 'John has come neither eating bread nor drinking wine' (mete pinon oion), and they say he has a demon. In the next verse Jesus, in contrast, is called by his accusers 'a glutton and a drinker of wine' (phagos kai oinopotes). The label 'drinker of wine' (oinopotes), a hapax (a word that occurs only once in the entire Bible) in the New Testament, would be incoherent if Jesus did not consume 'wine' (oinos). The accusation does not concede drunkenness, the Lord remained sinless, but it lexically locates him as one who drank 'wine' (oinos) in distinction from the abstaining Baptist.

Prov.20.1 · for · genre: wisdom · figures: personification

Key terms. H3196 יַיִן, H7941 שֶׂכָר, H3887 לוֹץ

Reasoning. 'Wine' (yayin) is a 'mock' (lets), a participle of 'to mock' (luts), and 'strong drink' (shekar) is a 'brawler' (homeh) from 'to be boisterous' (hamah), and whoever staggers in it is not wise. The personification fixes censure on the disordering power of the drink and on the one led astray by it. The syntax does not pronounce the substance evil in itself, the predication is on the captive who is unwise. The verse underwrites the drunkenness-is-sin clause without forbidding measured use.

1Cor.6.10 · for · genre: epistle

Key terms. G3183 μέθυσος

Reasoning. Paul lists 'drunkards' (methysoi), with thieves, the greedy, revilers, and swindlers as those who will not inherit the kingdom of God. The noun 'drunkard' (methysos) names the person habituated to drunkenness, distinct from 'wine' (oinos) as substance. The vice-list grammar predicates exclusion on the habitual condition, not on having consumed wine. This is independent lexical reinforcement of the drunkenness prohibition without prejudice to 'wine' (oinos) itself.

Gal.5.21 · for · genre: epistle

Key terms. G3178 μέθη, G2970 κῶμος

Reasoning. Among the works of the flesh Paul lists 'drunken bouts' (methai), plural of 'drunkenness' (methe), and 'revelries' (komoi). Both nouns name social-state vices, not substances. Paul warns that those who practice such things will not inherit the kingdom of God, the verb 'to practice' (prasso) conveys habitual practice. The prohibition is again on the disordered state, not on the substance 'wine' (oinos).

Hab.2.15 · for · genre: prophecy

Key terms. H7937 שכר

Reasoning. 'Woe to him who makes his neighbor drink, joining his wrath to it, and also makes him drunk' (Hoy mashqe re'ehu mesappeach chamatcha ve-af shakker). The piel infinitive (the Hebrew intensive verbal-noun form) 'to make drunk' (shakker) places the censure on inducing intoxication in another. The text condemns the active causation of drunkenness, again reinforcing that the prohibited target is the state, not the drink in itself.

Num.6.3 · for · genre: law

Key terms. H3196 יין, H7941 שכר

Reasoning. The Nazirite vow requires the dedicated person to separate from 'wine' (yayin) and 'strong drink' (shekar), the same two terms permitted in Deuteronomy 14:26. The statute's existence as a vocational, temporary, voluntary separation is itself lexical evidence that the default state for Israelites is permission. If 'wine' (yayin) were already forbidden universally, the vow would have nothing to mark. The same logic applies to Leviticus 10:9, where priests on duty are restricted, a setting-specific carve-out from a permitted norm.

Rom.14.21 · for · genre: epistle

Key terms. G3631 οἶνος, G4624 σκανδαλίζω

Reasoning. 'It is good neither to eat meat nor to drink wine nor anything by which your brother stumbles' (Kalon to me phagein krea mede piein oinon mede en ho ho adelphos sou proskoptei). The infinitive 'to drink' (piein) with 'wine' (oinos) as object treats drinking wine as a thing one may freely do or forgo. The controlling principle is the conscience of the weaker brother, not the intrinsic status of the drink. The grammar therefore confirms underlying liberty by treating abstention as the voluntary yielding of something otherwise permitted, while supplying a love-shaped qualifier on its exercise.

Complicating texts

Rom.14.21 · addressed

The verse pronouncing it good to abstain from 'wine' (oinos) if it stumbles a brother is treated by some as restricting the liberty rather than presupposing it. Lexically it presupposes the liberty, since 'to drink wine' (piein oinon) would not be a thing one could yield if it were already forbidden, and the conditional clause (the 'if-then' clause) 'by which your brother stumbles' (en ho ho adelphos sou proskoptei) makes the abstention case-specific to the brother's conscience. The verse therefore supports the proposition's qualifier that liberty is shaped by love, not its negation.

Prov.23.31 · addressed

'Do not look at the wine when it is red' (Al tere yayin ki yit'addam). The verb 'to look' (ra'ah) here governs an attractive gaze, and verses 32-35 describe the predictable terminus, biting like a serpent, seeing strange things, staggering. The clause's syntax targets the seductive path that ends in the staggering of verse 34, not the substance per se. The same chapter coordinates with Proverbs 20:1, which censures the disordering effect, and with the positive use in Psalm 104:15, which the same vocabulary, 'wine' (yayin), includes in divine benefaction.

Prov.23.29 · addressed

The serial questions, woe, sorrow, contentions, complaints, wounds without cause, redness of eyes, set up the verses on 'wine' (yayin) that follow. The literary frame identifies the subject as those who tarry long over wine, 'those who linger over the wine' (le-meacharim al ha-yayin). The censure falls on the prolonged tarrying, the duration adverb, which lexically targets habitual indulgence rather than tasting itself.

Isa.5.11 · addressed

'Woe to those who rise early in the morning to pursue strong drink' (Hoy mashkimei va-boqer shekar yirdophu). The temporal phrase 'in the morning' (ba-boqer), and the verb 'to pursue' (radaph), mark the censure as fixed on disordered pursuit, not on the substance. The same prophet uses 'wine' (yayin) elsewhere in restoration imagery, e.g., Isaiah 55:1 where 'wine' (yayin) is offered freely as gift of grace, which forecloses reading Isaiah 5:11 as a categorical ban.

All cited New Testament verses lie outside the open-cbqm 3 John sample, so CBGM (Coherence-Based Genealogical Method, a tool for analyzing manuscript variants) data was not consulted and ECM apparatus (the critical edition of New Testament textual variants) status is treated as not in scope. The bundle reports `not_in_ecm_scope` true with no variant units. Minor orthographic (spelling) and word-order variants in Ephesians 5:18, 1 Timothy 5:23, and the John 2 narrative do not touch the load-bearing words 'wine' (oinos), 'to get drunk' (methysko), 'addicted to wine' (paroinos), 'to use' (chraomai), or the imperatives. The verdict holds across all plausible variant readings of the cited verses.

Frameworks in play. christian_liberty, stumbling_block_qualification, abstentionism, two_wine_theory

analogia scripturae invoked

christian_liberty: affirms · Takes 'wine' (oinos) and 'wine' (yayin) univocally as fermented drink. Reads the positive imperative of 1 Timothy 5:23, the 'good wine' (kalon oinos) of John 2:10, the divine gift of Psalm 104:15, the tithe celebration of Deuteronomy 14:26, and the elder qualification 'not addicted to wine' (me paroinon) as jointly establishing that the substance is permitted. Confines the prohibitions to the state named by 'to get drunk' (methysko), 'drunkenness' (methe), 'drunkard' (methysos), 'addicted to wine' (paroinos), 'to be drunk' (shakar), and reads Romans 14:21 as a love-qualifier on a permitted liberty. On this lens the proposition is fully affirmed.

stumbling_block_qualification: affirms · Agrees the substance is permitted and the state is forbidden, but emphasizes that Romans 14:21 and 1 Corinthians 8 make the actual exercise of the liberty subordinate to the brother's conscience, so that in given settings voluntary abstention is the more excellent way. This is not a denial of the proposition but a refinement of how the liberty is exercised, which the proposition itself contemplates with the words 'matter of Christian liberty'.

abstentionism: partially_affirms · Concedes that the lexicon does not call the substance sinful and that drunkenness is sin, but argues that the cumulative force of warnings against the disordering power of 'wine' (yayin) and 'strong drink' (shekar), the priestly and Nazirite restrictions, and the modern context of widespread abuse make voluntary total abstention pastorally wise. On the lexical pattern alone the proposition stands, this lens is best understood as a prudential application rather than a denial of the underlying liberty.

two_wine_theory: denies · Argues that 'wine' (oinos) and 'wine' (yayin) can sometimes denote unfermented grape juice, so that commended wine in John 2 and 1 Timothy 5:23 is read as non-alcoholic while only fermented references are censured. Stated in its strongest form, the lens appeals to context-dependent semantic range, the broad family of vine products including 'new wine' (tiros) and 'steeped grapes' (mishrah), and the Greek practice of mixing wine with water to lower alcoholic content. Lexically this construal is minority and faces three difficulties. First, the same noun 'wine' (oinos) is the thing that intoxicates in Ephesians 5:18 and the thing commended in 1 Timothy 5:23 and John 2:10, with no morphological cue distinguishing senses. Second, Deuteronomy 14:26 pairs 'wine' (yayin) with 'strong drink' (shekar), the strongest Hebrew term for fermented drink, in a celebratory permission. Third, the elder qualification 'not addicted to wine' (me paroinon) would be redundant if 'wine' (oinos) were not the kind of drink one could be addicted to. The lens is presented fairly here but the lexical pattern does not sustain its central claim.

The verdict turns on whether the canon distinguishes substance from state, which the vocabulary plainly does. A separate word family covers intoxication, namely 'to get drunk' (methysko), 'drunkenness' (methe), 'drunkard' (methysos), 'addicted to wine' (paroinos), 'drinker of wine' (oinopotes), 'to be drunk' (shakar), while 'wine' (oinos) and 'wine' (yayin) name the drink that appears both in censure of disordered indulgence and in divine gift and apostolic command. Analogia scripturae (interpreting Scripture by Scripture) across Pentateuch, Wisdom, Prophets, Gospels, and Epistles supplies a stable pattern. The stumbling-block lens is included within liberty rather than against it.

Stem audit

verdict-preloaded: yes

Neutralized form. Whether the canon's vocabulary distinguishes the substance 'wine' (oinos) and 'wine' (yayin), treated positively as gift, command, and apostolic prescription, from the state of intoxication, named by a separate word family and forbidden, and how the stumbling-block principle of Romans 14:21 qualifies the exercise of the liberty, is the question under test.

After direct querying of the lexical store for the full canon distribution of 'wine' (oinos), 'wine' (yayin), 'strong drink' (shekar), 'new wine' (tiros), 'to get drunk' (methysko), 'to be drunk' (methyo), 'drunkenness' (methe), 'drunkard' (methysos), 'addicted to wine' (paroinos), 'drinker of wine' (oinopotes), and 'to be drunk' (shakar), and after pulling Deuteronomy 14:26, Numbers 6:3, Leviticus 10:9, 1 Timothy 3:3, Titus 1:7, 1 Timothy 3:8, Luke 7:33-34, 1 Corinthians 6:10, Galatians 5:21, and Habakkuk 2:15 by morphology, the case for the proposition is strong. The substance words are commended pan-canonically (spread across the whole Bible) as divine gift, statute-level permitted celebration, apostolic medicinal command, Lord's miraculous provision rated good, and presupposed by the elder qualification 'not given to wine', which would be redundant on a flat ban. The drunkenness vocabulary is a distinct lexical field uniformly censured. The two-wine theory survives as a minority construal but is not supported by the morphology or by Deuteronomy 14:26's pairing of 'wine' (yayin) with 'strong drink' (shekar). Affirms set to true. The original stem is mildly preloaded by naming it a matter of Christian liberty and by naming the tested tradition's counsel of abstinence, so verdict_preloaded remains true and the neutralized_form is recorded, but the verdict derived on the original stem also holds on the neutralized form. The phrase 'drunkenness is sin' is a separately testable claim and is the part the lexicon most clearly supports.
